

THE NEW YORK TIMES, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1959.

Associated Press Wirephoto
DEDICATES NEW BUILDING: President Eisenhower prepares to lay the cornerstone of the Central Intelligence Agency building in Langley, Va. Standing next to cornerstone is Allen W. Dulles, director of agency.

DOCUMENT NO. _____

NO CHANGE IN CLASS ☐

☒ DECLASSIFIED

EXEMPTED TO: TS S C

NEXT REVIEW DATE: _____

AUTH: HR 10-2

DATE 28 APR 1991 REVIEWER: 029725

Approved For Release 2000/06/30 : CIA-RDP78-04506A000100030038-3

PRESIDENT HAILS C. I. A. OPERATIVES

Calls Them 'Unsung Heroes' in Dedication New 'Cloak and Dagger' Building

By FELIX BELAIR Jr.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 3 —

President Eisenhower laid the cornerstone of the new Central Intelligence Agency building today, dedicating it to the "undecorated and unsung heroes" of the intelligence forces at home and abroad.

His participation in the ceremonies at near-by Langley, Va., brought out of official hiding an important Federal agency, whose expenditures are not subject to Congressional review and whose employes have been forbidden to say where they work.

The official program, however, included everything but a road map to the $46,000,000 building, situated on a bluff ten miles west of Washington on the south side of the Potomac River.

In the agency's headquarters in downtown Washington, meanwhile, operations continued in the cloak-and-dagger tradition. The switchboard was still answering calls by repeating the telephone number rather than identifying the agency by name. The same technique was used when an official was requested by name.

Driving to the dedication site, the President stopped to cut a ribbon opening a section of the George Washington Memorial Parkway. It was built at a cost of $9,400,000 to provide quick access to the new building from Washington.

In his brief, prepared remarks the President said that only on the basis of comprehensive and appropriate information could the country develop policies to make peace permanent and just.

"In war," he said, "nothing is more important to a commander than the facts concerning the strength, dispositions and intention of his opponent, and the proper interpretation of those facts."

"In peacetime, the necessary facts are of a different nature. They deal with conditions, resources, requirements and attitudes prevailing in the world. They and their proper interpretation are essential to the development of policy to further our long-term national security and best interests."

"No task could be more important."

Work Gets 'Little Reward'

The very nature of the work of the C. I. A. requires of its members "the highest order of dedication, ability, trustworthiness and selflessness — saying nothing of the highest type of courage whenever needed," the President noted.

"In the work of intelligence," he went on, "heroes are undecorated and unsung, often even among their own fraternity."

"Their inspiration is rooted in patriotism; their reward can be little except the conviction that they are performing a unique and indispensable service for their country, and the knowledge that America needs and appreciates their efforts. I assure you this is indeed true."

The President was introduced by Allen W. Dulles, C. I. A. director, to an audience made up largely of Government officials and members of the diplomatic corps.

Mr. Dulles recalled that World War II had brought home to the United States its vital interests in such distant places as Korea, Laos and Africa.

He sought to make two main points—that "facts have no politics" and that the C. I. A. was not involved in policy-making.

"In this work of intelligence," he said, "we must not forget that human beings are largely the creatures of their beliefs. As individuals, we tend instinctively, and sometimes wistfully, to become attached to causes, to theories, to solutions."

"If they be sound and enduring, based on the deep moral strivings of man and the highest conception of our national interests, let us cling to them. But in the field of our relations with our fellow men abroad, let us assure ourselves, through accurate intelligence, that our attachments to policies are soundly based."

Road signs marked the distance and way to the new building. However, neither Virginia State Troopers on the scene nor District of Columbia motorcycle policemen could say for certain whether the markers would be there tomorrow.

As a box was about to be sealed in the cornerstone, the President asked Mr. Dulles, in an aside, what was in it.

Mr. Dulles replied, "It's a list of names of people who had been listed in the official program."

DOCUMENT NO. _____
NO CHANGE IN CLASS ☐
DECLASSIFIED
CLASS. AUTHORITY: TS S C
NEXT REVIEW DATE: _____
AUTH: HR 10-2
DATE 28 APR 1981 REVIEWER: 029725